Death in Custody: Right to Life in Turkish Prisons Policy Paper¹

The Journalists and Writers Foundation² has constantly noted with great concern, the increasing number of suspicious deaths in custody since the attempted coup of July 15, 2016 in Turkey, taking place in suspicious circumstances and in a pattern of systematic recurrence.³ The sheer number of deaths amongst individuals deprived of their liberty comes amid severe persecution in the country and a steady deteriorating human rights situation, exacerbated by the erosion of the rule of law.

According to the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights,⁴ following the coup attempt, at least 152,000 civil servants have been dismissed, and some were also arrested, for alleged connections with the coup, including 107,944 individuals named in lists attached to emergency decrees.⁵ The Ministry of Interior announced that by the end of 2017, 159,506 individuals had been arrested in relation to the emergency decrees.⁶ Among them are hundreds of journalists and some of the country's top police officers, civil servants, prosecutors, judges and lawyers.

Over the last two years, the Journalists and Writers Foundation has documented the death, under very suspicious circumstances, of at least sixty-one (61) individuals deprived of their liberty in the context of “measures undertaken against the coup plotters”. The profile of individuals who have lost their lives under custody in the aftermath of the attempted coup casts shadow over the official narrative pointing out in many cases to suicide. Ever since family members of other “high-profile” prisoners have launched desperate appeals⁷ calling on the international community to save their loved ones from extrajudicial execution in Turkish prisons. This policy brief provides a closer look at this increasingly troubling situation and its international law implications.

I. Background – The Attempted Coup and the State of Emergency

The Republic of Turkey is a State party to nine core international human rights treaties,⁸ in addition to regional human rights treaties, to which it has acceded as a member of the Council of Europe. International norms into force in Turkey are further complemented by a number of standard-setting tools, which will be also referred to in the present paper.

Over the past several years preceding to the coup attempt, Turkey has experienced a sharp declining trend in almost all indicators, including freedom of expression, pluralism, freedom of association, press freedom, and the rule of law. The Gezi Park protests in 2013, the corruption scandal of December 2013 and the collapse of peace negotiations in July 2015 respectively, encouraged the intensification of hostilities in south-east and the crackdown on dissent, in particular against the Hizmet/Gülen Movement and its alleged members.

In the late hours of July 15, 2016⁹ a small faction of the Turkish Armed Forces (TSK) that called themselves the “Peace at Home Council” attempted to seize control of several key places in Ankara, Istanbul and other locations. The so-called “Peace at Home Council” cited an alleged erosion of secularism, the elimination of democratic rule, the disregard for human rights, and Turkey's loss of credibility in the international arena as reasons for staging the coup.¹⁰ As crowds of people took to the streets, dozens of pro-coup soldiers abandoned their tanks and other military vehicles. Forces loyal to the government were able to defeat the coup plotters and the attempted coup was thwarted within approximately 12 hours. According to official sources, at least 246 people were killed and more than 2,000 were injured during the attempt.¹¹ On the night of July 15, as the attempted coup was still unfolding, speaking through a smartphone to the TV channel CNN-Turk, President Erdoğan declared Fethullah Gülen¹² as the “mastermind of the coup” highlighting further that - “This uprising is a gift from God to us, because this will be a reason to cleanse our army.”

The attempted coup drove the regime to more extreme forms of repression, as it triggered president Erdoğan's extreme sense of threat from both domestic and foreign enemies. His assault on state and civil society institutions, particularly against the media education and academia, goes far beyond the reasonable. Unfortunately, many of the state and societal institutions that the regime associates with that threat are also the institutions that would traditionally provide structural defense against authoritarian descent.

On July 20, 2016, the Government decided that a nationwide state of emergency would be declared as from July 21st, pursuant to Article 120 of the Constitution and Article 3 § 1 (b) of the Law on the State of Emergency.¹³ On July 21, 2016 the decision on the state of emergency was communicated to the United Nations and the Council of Europe, along with a notice of derogation from the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) and the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR).¹⁴ The Turkish Government notified the UN Secretary-General of its invocation of article 4 of the ICCPR, and that the derogation involved obligations under 13 Articles of the ICCPR.¹⁵

According to the United Nations Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR), “many of the decrees contain provisions that fall short of basic human rights safeguards and Turkey’s obligations under international law.” In addition, “[...] emergency decrees foster impunity and lack of accountability by affording legal, administrative, criminal and financial immunity to administrative authorities acting within the framework of the decrees.” The OHCHR further has noted with concern that, “according to the decision of the Constitutional Court of November 4, 2016, the decrees are not subject to judicial review,” and that “several decrees regulate various matters unrelated to the state of emergency, for instance the closure of civil society organizations and medical centers, which seems to indicate that they are being used to limit various legitimate activities.”¹⁶

Initially meant to last only ninety days, the State of Emergency was extended seven times before being officially lifted two-years after the attempted coup. Thirty-two (32) arbitrary emergency decrees with a sweeping nature were issued during the two-year period. They have already radically transformed Turkey and used to consolidate extraordinary powers vested with the President, following the April 16, 2017 referendum and the June 24, 2018 elections.

Most of the measures introduced under the emergency decrees are not limited to the duration of the State of Emergency. Those measures include:

- Permanent dismissal from public office
- Cancellation of professional licenses
- Dismissal from public institutions (targeting retired public officials)
- Reduction in rank
- Stripping of combat medals
- Confiscation of assets
- Ban on travel abroad and cancellation of passports
- Permanent closure of organizations and institutions
- Confiscation of assets of individuals or entities
- Appointment of trustees

In addition, important changes introduced to key pieces of legislation in Turkey, including criminal procedure law are not confined to the duration of the state of emergency. With many of the state of emergency measures remaining into force and the new extraordinary presidential powers likely continuing to strip away fundamental rights and freedoms, the lifting of the state of emergency is considered largely cosmetic.

II. Arbitrary Deprivation of Liberty

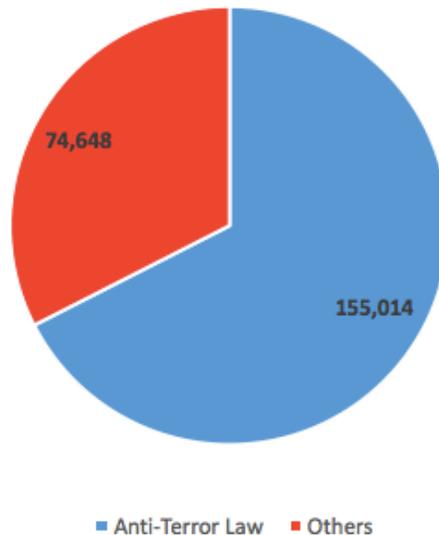

The state of emergency into force since July 2016 in Turkey has removed the few existing legal safety nets against arbitrary detention and arrest. The sweeping measures introduced during the state of emergency have stripped individuals of all legal recourse against arbitrary measures, including through denial of access to a lawyer during police custody, prolonged pre-trial detention and ill-treatment of detainees.

Under the state of emergency, the maximum period of police custody increased from 4 to 30 days. Article 3 of Decree Law No. 668 of 27 July 2016, entitled “Investigation and prosecution procedures”, under which the right of the suspect in custody to see his/her lawyer may be restricted for five days upon the decision of the public prosecutor, noting that no statement should be taken during that time. The government has also imposed restrictions on lawyers in visiting their clients as well as the recording of the conversations and seizure of documents pertinent to the defense, measures which in practical terms make the principle of undisturbed access to legal counsel and a fair trial impossible.

Based on credible reports the Journalists and Writers Foundation and other civil society organizations, including the OHCHR have documented increased executive control over, and interference with the judiciary and prosecution service; the arrest, dismissal and arbitrary transfer of judges and prosecutors to other courts; and recurring instances of threats against lawyers.¹⁷ The latter have been reluctant to represent those accused of alleged links to the coup for fear that they would be tainted by association or for being associated with the attempted coup if they did. OHCHR has also observed a pattern of persecution of lawyers representing individuals accused of terrorism offences, being associated with their clients' cause (or alleged cause) while discharging their official functions, and consequently prosecuted for the same or related crime attributed to their client.¹⁸ In addition to extensive limitations, many lawyer's associations across the country have been shut down and at least 580 lawyers are under arrest, while detention warrants have been issued for 1,539 attorneys since the attempted coup.¹⁹

The sheer number of 228,137 individuals taken into custody²⁴ and detained on remand as a result, and over 79,774 arrests²⁵ since the attempted coup with little or no clarity about the charges, is highly disturbing. The occupational profile of those detained reveals that the majority are members of the judiciary, public officials, members of the parliament, mayors, journalists, human rights defenders, academics, teachers, lawyers, businessmen, students and members of the military. From the number of detained persons, including immediately in the aftermath of the attempted coup, it is evident that reasonable suspicion, an essential requirement for the imposition of pretrial detention, has not been present at every stage of individual detention.

The disastrous consequences and the impact of the state of emergency on the Turkish society as a whole are yet to be fully understood in the future, as the impact of those measures will be felt in the many years to come. Based on the review of cases brought to the attention of the Journalists and Writers Foundation and many human rights and other organizations, the deprivation of liberty has been imposed in an unlawful and arbitrary manner - inconsistent with international standards set forth in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and relevant international legal instruments accepted by Turkey.

Not only has the detention and arrest of hundreds of thousands of individuals been arbitrary, but law enforcement has also been subject to reprisals and punishment for declining to be part of government wrongdoings in fabricating charges on innocent individuals. The OHCHR has also received credible reports that “a number of police officers who refused to participate in arbitrary arrests, torture and other repressive acts under the state of emergency were dismissed and/or arrested on charges of supporting terrorism.”²⁶

III. Torture and Ill-Treatment in Places of Deprivation of Liberty

Even before the attempted coup of July 15, 2016, the Concluding Observations to the fourth periodic report of Turkey on the implementation of the Convention against Torture²⁷ reveal a disturbing track-record of systematic torture and ill-treatment that the authorities in Turkey have established in recent years, which goes mostly unpunished.

The response to the attempted coup exacerbated the already critical human rights situation, paving the way, inter alia, to unprecedented practice of systematic torture and ill-treatment throughout the country. Following the coup attempt, in places of deprivation from liberty across Turkey, prisoners started hearing moaning, screaming, and groaning for long periods of time, including during night - suggesting cruel methods of torture were used. To suppress horrific sounds from torture victims, in several establishments prisoners reported the erection of what they described as “sponged corporal punishment rooms.” They are better known as “soundproof rooms” used for torture.

The response of the international community to the horrors unfolding in the aftermath of July 15, 2016 aftermath has been swift. Among other, the Council of Europe Committee for the Prevention of Torture carried out two visits to the country; from August 29 to September 6, 2016 and between May 10 and 23, 2017. As of July 2018, the government of Turkey has yet to consent making public those reports. On December 18, 2017, the Special Rapporteur on torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment²⁸ released his report on his mission to Turkey, submitted to the 37th session of the Human Rights Council. His report²⁹ documents a consistent pattern of systematic practice of torture in Turkey in the wake of the coup attempt of ²⁶ See for example, OHCHR “Report on the impact of the state of emergency on human rights in Turkey, including an update on the South-East (January – December 2017), March 2018, para 75.

²⁸ Mr. Nils Melzer.

²⁹ The report is contained in document A/HRC/37/50/Add/1.

July 15, 2016. The report further provides a comprehensive analysis regarding torture and ill-treatment following the attempted coup, including the methods of torture used; severe beatings, punches and kicking, blows with objects, falaqa, threats and verbal abuse, being forced to strip naked, rape with objects and other sexual violence or threats thereof, sleep deprivation, stress positions, and extended blindfolding and/or handcuffing for several days.

In addition, on February 27, 2018 the Special Rapporteur on Torture “expressed serious concerns about the rising allegations of torture and other ill-treatment in Turkish police custody since the end of his official visit to the country in December 2016. Melzer expressed alarm on the allegations that large numbers of individuals suspected of links to the Gülenist Movement or the armed Kurdistan Workers’ Party were exposed to brutal interrogation techniques aimed at extracting forced confessions or coercing detainees to incriminate others. The Special Rapporteur noted that no serious measures appeared to have been taken by the authorities to investigate these allegations or to hold perpetrators accountable.”³⁰

In the same vein, the latest report³¹ of the Office of High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) on the situation of human rights in Turkey published in the end of March 2018, “documents [inter alia] the use of torture and ill-treatment in custody, including severe beatings, threats of sexual assault and actual sexual assault, electric shocks and waterboarding by police, gendarmerie, military police and security forces.”

Government representatives have made sometimes little or no effort to hide most evidence of ill-treatment and torture emerging in the press or social media, including during the first days after the coup attempt. They have however repeatedly claimed that there have been no cases of torture or ill-treatment in prisons and all the claims to the contrary were “unfounded,” underlining also that “Turkey has zero tolerance for torture.”

Incapacitating and rendering completely ineffective, among other important prevention mechanisms, such as the Human Rights and Equality Institution of Turkey and the Parliament’s Committee on Human Rights Inquiry, the government has also ensured that perpetrators of serious human rights violations, including torture in places of deprivation of liberty, are granted complete impunity from prosecution.

One day before the attempted coup, on July 14, 2016, with the adoption of the retroactive Law No. 6722, state officials perpetrating human rights violations during curfews were protected legally. The pervasive climate of impunity in the country was legally “reinforced” with the promulgation of the Decree-Law No. 667³² which states that “Legal, administrative, financial and criminal liabilities shall not arise in respect of the persons who have adopted decisions and fulfill their duties within the scope of this Decree Law.”³³ With a September 1, 2016 decree, the Government also dissolved the prison monitoring boards, evidently with the intention of avoiding any allegation on torture and ill-treatment making it beyond prison walls.³⁴ Further to granting impunity for public officials, Decree-Law No. 696 issued on December 24, 2017, extended that immunity to civilians “whether they have an official title or not, and whether they have carried out official duties or not”. The new provision³⁵ allows vigilantes to carry out political violence with impunity against opponents of the government, they might suspect of involvement in the attempted coup of July 15, 2016 (or its continuation). The decree granting immunity does not make it clear what sort of actions could be seen as furthering the aims of the coup, for which civilians carrying out revenge attacks are now be protected from punishment.³⁶

In addition to torture and ill-treatment, in the two-years following the attempted coup, the Journalist and Writers Foundation and other organizations, have documented other widespread human rights violations, including alleged cases of extrajudicial executions and enforced disappearances.³⁷

IV. Conditions of Detention and Imprisonment

Even before the July 15 coup attempt, Turkey's criminal system was overstretched, with crowded prisons and backlogged courts. Prisons quickly filled to capacity in the days and weeks after the coup attempt, and many detainees found themselves sleeping in shifts, even in the communal spaces, often without any bedding. Authorities also used sports arenas, temporary tents and other unofficial detention facilities to house the tens of thousands rounded up in alleged connection with the coup attempt. Detainees were reportedly kept naked and handcuffed as they were deprived of their basic human rights, including sufficient water and food. In August 2016, acting under powers granted by the state of emergency, authorities announced (and implemented) plans to release 38,000 prisoners (roughly one in five in Turkish prisons, convicted of fraud, rape, theft, looting extortion and other serious crimes), to make room for the wave of journalists, teachers, lawyers, civil servants and judges detained after the coup attempt.

As of March 20, 2018, at least 224,974 inmates and detainees were deprived of their liberty in Turkey.³⁸ Out of them 57.5% (129,472) were inmates having received final sentences, 11% (24,813) deprived of liberty and awaiting the outcome of respective appeals and 33.2% (70,689) detainees pending trial or investigation. In comparison, in 2015 the total number of those arrested/convicted/sentenced was 178,089 and 154,179 in 2014. When the AKP came into power, this number was around 59,429, or only one-fourth of those currently deprived of liberty.

Based on the information provided by the Ministry of Justice General Directorate of Prisons and Detention Houses, there are currently³⁹ 389 penitentiary institutions prisons with a total capacity of 210,882 individuals.⁴⁰

³⁸ Source: <http://istatistikler.uyap.gov.tr/>.

³⁹ As of July 12, 2018.

⁴⁰ These institutions include 287 closed prisons, 74 are open prisons, 4 are juvenile reformatory houses, 10 closed prisons for women, 7 open prisons for women and 7 closed prisons for juveniles. For more please see <http://www.cte.adalet.gov.tr/#>.

The Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners⁴¹ are often regarded by states as the primary – if not the only source of standards relating to treatment in detention, and are the key framework used by monitoring and inspection mechanisms in assessing the treatment of prisoners. In 2015 the Standard Minimum Rules were revised and adopted⁴² as the Nelson Mandela Rules following a process or revision that started in 2010.

A comprehensive study carried out in 2017 on prison conditions in Turkey⁴³ by the Platform for Peace and Justice⁴⁴ reveals that 72 out of 80 prisons are inadequate for accommodating individuals deprived of their liberty. In addition to being in breach of most of the Nelson Mandela Rules, it does certainly appear that the government of Turkey is also intentionally disregarding the Basic Principles, contained in Rules 1-5, which provide for the following:

1. Prisoners must be treated with respect for their inherent dignity and value as human beings.
2. Torture or other ill-treatment is prohibited.
3. Prisoners should be treated according to their needs, without discrimination.
4. The purpose of prison is to protect society and reduce reoffending.
5. The safety of prisoners, staff, service providers and visitors at all times is paramount

None of the arbitrary restrictions and limitations imposed in particular on those allegedly linked to the Hizmet/Gülen Movement have any penological goal, other than intentional infliction of unwarranted and unlawful pain and suffering. Among the restrictions are also the ban of watching TV or listening the radio, access to books, access to cultural and art events, attendance of courses, use of sports facilities, incoming and outgoing communications etc.

The Journalists and Writers Foundation is finally, seriously concerned that those deprived of their liberty face significant obstacles and the required medical personnel and equipment are not available. In this connection, a recent study from the Human Rights Association of Turkey (IHD) found that there are 1,154 sick prisoners, including 401 seriously ill in Turkey's prisons.⁴⁵ Measures undertaken against the alleged members of the Hizmet/Gülen Movement have had an adverse effect on family members, and it is believed, in all instances in particular on children.

⁴¹ The Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners were first adopted in 1957.

⁴² The revised Standard Minimum Rules were adopted unanimously by the UN General Assembly (Contained in document A/Res/70/175) of December 17, 2015.

The denial of the right to life has been “extended” to include children born in discriminated families, through intentional, targeted discriminatory policies in the provision of health care and other necessary services to children. In many cases, unborn children have not survived due to government's victimization and the psychological pressure on their parents. The government has cut off disability and social benefits to spouses or children of parents detained or arrested over alleged links to the Hizmet/Gülen Movement. Children of individuals perceived close to the movement are also denied health care in hospitals and health centers.⁴⁶⁴⁷

The government has resorted to intentional methods and practices of violence that are particularly harmful and dehumanizing against alleged members or sympathizers of the Hizmet movement, with the intention of causing humiliation, fear, and terror. As a direct result of these policies, children of individuals accused of being close to the Hizmet movement have increasingly resorted to changing their last names, in order for them not to be associated with their parents [Hizmet movement] and avoid, inter alia, discrimination, harassment, and pressure at schools, in their neighborhoods and beyond.⁴⁸ In several cases brought to the attention of the JWF, children have succumbed to the immense psychological and other pressure. Some also appear to have committed suicide.⁴⁹

The comprehensive report of the Journalists and Writers Foundation on the rights of children also found that by the end of August 2017, six hundred sixty-eight (668) children under the age of six were deprived of their liberty across Turkey with their mothers, detained or arrested as part of the government crackdown on the Hizmet Movement. One hundred forty-nine (149) of those children were infants under a year old.⁵⁰ Growing up in prison conditions, sometimes lacking adequate food, necessary health care and other services, their physical and psychological development is at serious risk.

On the basis of numerous interviews and credible reports, OHCHR identified a particularly alarming pattern of detaining women just before or immediately after giving birth. OHCHR estimates that approximately 600 women with young children were being held in detention in

Turkey as of December 2017.⁵¹ Numerous reports of ill-treatment during childbirth in health facilities across Turkey provide a deeply distressing picture of the extent of the exposure of discriminated women to degrading treatment, verbal and physical violence.⁵² Many women have as a result lost their unborn babies and suffered miscarriage.⁵³

Persons with disabilities, elderly and the sick have also been disproportionately targeted, following the attempted coup. As a State Party to the CRPD, Turkey has the obligation to recognize the rights of persons with disabilities and take appropriate steps to safeguard and promote the realization of their rights without discrimination. Instead, disabled persons in prisons, alleged members of the Hizmet Movement, face unnecessary suffering and humiliation, solitary confinement, incommunicado detention, denial of medical treatment and adequate nutrition – a situation which in itself amounts to torture and other cruel or degrading treatment or punishment.

In addition, according to the OHCHR, hundreds of women, children and elderly were among approximately 1,200 local residents summarily killed between July 2015 and December 2016, in the context of security operations in South-East Turkey. Women, children and elderly also constituted the majority of those reported internally displaced persons (IDPs) in South-East Turkey, estimated between 355,000 to half a million people, mainly citizens of Kurdish origin.⁵⁴ Finally, the report of the Special Rapporteur on torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment submitted to the 37th session of the Human Rights Council on the visit to Turkey found, inter alia, that many places of detention were allegedly severely overcrowded, and did not have adequate access to food, water or medical treatment.⁵⁵

V. Right to Life

The ‘right to life’ has been described at times as ‘the supreme right’ (see above), ‘one of the most important rights’,⁵⁶ ‘the most fundamental of all rights’,⁵⁷ ‘the primordial right’,⁵⁸ ‘the foundation and cornerstone of all the other rights’,⁵⁹ the ‘prerequisite for all other rights’,⁶⁰ and a right which is ‘basic to all human rights’.⁶¹ It is deemed to be a norm of customary international law and is an indispensable element of human rights treaties, at the international and the regional level.

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights, adopted by the United Nations General Assembly on 10 December 1948, declared the right to life in absolute fashion, any limitations being only implicit. It provides in its Article 3 that “Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of person.” The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, to which Turkey is a state party, recognizes and protects the right to life of all human beings. It is the supreme right from which no derogation is permitted⁶² even in situations of armed conflict and other public emergencies. The right to life has crucial importance both for individuals and for society as a whole. It is most precious for its own sake as a right that inheres in every human being, but it also constitutes a fundamental right,⁶³ whose effective protection is the prerequisite for the enjoyment of all other human rights and whose content can be informed and infused by other human rights. European law underwent an evolution parallel to that of the United Nations. At the regional level relevant for the instant case, the European Convention on Human Rights specified, in 1950, that “Everyone’s right to life shall be protected by law. No one shall be deprived of his life intentionally save in the execution of a sentence of a court following his conviction of a crime for which this penalty is provided by law.”

The right to life is a right which should not be interpreted narrowly. It concerns the entitlement of individuals to be free from acts and omissions intended or expected to cause their unnatural or premature death, as well as to enjoy a life with dignity. Paragraph 1 of Article 6 of the ICCPR provides that no one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his life and that the right shall be protected by law. This provision lays the foundation for the obligation of States parties to respect and ensure the right to life, to give effect to it through legislative and other measures, and to provide effective remedies and reparation to all victims of violations of the right to life. This provision guarantees the right to life for all human beings, without distinction of any kind, including for persons suspected or convicted of even the most serious crimes.

At the United Nations level, those obligations are elaborated in two key documents; (1) the UN principles on the Effective Prevention and Investigation of Extra-Legal, Arbitrary and Summary Executions (1989), complemented by (2) the UN Manual on the Effective Prevention and Investigation of Extra-Legal, Arbitrary and Summary Executions (1991), or the Minnesota Protocol. The latter sets out international legal standards for the prevention of unlawful death and the investigation of potentially unlawful death. To ensure that the Protocol retains its relevance and reflects advances in international human rights law, it was revised and updated in 2016.

The obligations on states to respect and protect life and the procedural obligation to investigate suspicious deaths have firm bases in international law.⁶⁴ International law imposes both, the obligations to respect and protect life in all circumstances and to duly investigate suspected violations of the right to life. In particular States have the duty:⁶⁵

- To respect and ensure the right to life of persons within their jurisdiction, including when such persons are held in custody, whether in public or in private settings.
- To respect and ensure the right to life implies that no one may be arbitrarily deprived of his or her life.

⁶⁵ See also the ICRC Guidelines for Investigating Deaths in Custody, available at: <https://www.icrc.org/eng/assets/files/publications/icrc-002-4126.pdf>.

- To ensure that no exceptional circumstance whatsoever, including a public emergency as in the case of Turkey, may be invoked to justify derogation from the duty to respect and ensure the right to life.
- To respect and ensure the right to life from all branches and organs of the State, including law enforcement agencies, security forces and the military.

The right to life also entails positive obligations for States. They are therefore not only obliged to refrain from violating the right to life in any circumstance. States are also required to:

- Adopt legislative, judicial, administrative and other measures to ensure that no one is arbitrarily deprived of his or her life.
- Ensure adequate conditions of detention for all those in custody, which includes providing access to food and water in sufficient quantities and of adequate quality, as well as to medical care, and guaranteeing their safety and security.
- Conduct a prompt and independent official investigation whenever a person dies in custody.
- Take appropriate measures to protect the lives of persons detained by non-State actors whose acts or omissions are not attributable to the State and who operate within its jurisdiction.
- States should finally ensure that a competent body investigates the deaths of persons detained by non-state actors.

Since the attempted coup, president Erdoğan and his government have gone to the extreme many times by declaring that Hizmet/Gülen Movement members do not have a right to life and will beg for death in prisons.⁶⁶⁶⁷ He and members of his government have repeatedly and publicly discussed the idea of reinstating the death penalty specifically for the members of the Hizmet/Gülen Movement.⁶⁸ While the reinstatement of the death penalty may not be legally feasible⁶⁹ and would in turn further isolate Turkey, an avenue that the authorities seem not be willing to follow, the analysis of this increasingly concerning issue and also empirical evidence show that the same “result” is now being pursued through extrajudicial executions, both in places of deprivation of liberty and in the streets of Turkey, in very suspicious circumstances and also through enforced and involuntary disappearances.

During the first days in the aftermath of the attempted coup, the Turkish government removed all the safeguards against torture, effectively writing a blank check to law enforcement agencies to torture and mistreat detainees.⁷⁰ Even though the government has vehemently denied that torture and ill-treatment has played a role to deaths under custody and autopsy reports, as well as investigation files have been kept confidential, it is beyond doubt that at least several of the deaths under police custody were a direct consequence of widespread, systematic and deliberate torture by the government of Turkey.⁷¹

Several months after the attempted coup it appears that plans were made for many detainees, real or perceived members or the Hizmet/Gülen Movement to be summarily executed by allegedly opening prison gates with deployed soldiers or members of the SADAT militia shooting down prisoners “escaping” in a staged prison break. Widespread claims in social media claimed that militants planned to launch a killing spree in prisons under the pretext of an orchestrated escape plan, aiming to kill those involved in coup plot rendering any insight into the truths behind the coup attempt useless. The plan was aborted, allegedly due to public exposure.⁷²

Suspicious deaths of alleged members of the Hizmet/Gülen Movement in places of deprivation of liberty however only intensified. From the information contained in the enclosed lists, it can be concluded that the most common causes of death made public by the authorities are suicide, heart attack of seemingly healthy individuals and death as a result of lack of medical care. In all the cases no prompt or independent official investigations have been conducted.

The Journalists and Writers Foundation is further seriously concerned on the clear trend of increasingly “high-profile” detainees among those dead in suspicious circumstances in places of deprivation of liberty. In particular, the family members of police officers and members of the judiciary who have in the past investigated high-level cases of corruption or other wrongdoing by individuals close to the ruling AKP party, have long shared concerns that their loved ones in prisons would become the next victim.

On July 1, 2018, Mr. Zeki Güven, former intelligence chief of the Ankara Police Department,⁷³ was found dead at Sincan No 1 F Type Prison in Ankara. The authorities claim he died due to a heart attack in his bed, but this does not explain how a seemingly healthy individual dies in prison less than two months after he was taken into custody, especially given the fact that he had no prior medical issues. His death has sent a shockwave among family members of other “high-profile” prisoners, who anticipate further extrajudicial executions in prison, targeting in particular individuals who might have actual knowledge of corruption or other crimes by those close to the ruling AKP party.

Family members have now launched desperate appeals⁷⁴ on the international community to help save their loved ones from extrajudicial execution in Turkish prisons.

VI. Recommended Steps for the International Community Response

In light of the above analysis and the anticipation of future unlawful actions in Turkish prisons by state agents acting on behalf of the government of Turkey, the Journalists and Writers Foundation urges the international community to ensure the protection of individuals who are at risk of arbitrary deprivation of their life. Below are some recommendations in this regard:

⁷³ Mr. Zeki Güven was arrested by a Turkish court in May 2018 under accusations of being an alleged member of the Hizmet/Gülen Movement.

⁷⁴ See e.g. <https://stockholmcf.org/daughters-of-jailed-turkish-police-chief-voice-concerns-about-fathers-safety-in-video-message/>

Directly address, as a matter of priority and importance, the deteriorating human rights situation in Turkey, including in relation to the arbitrary deprivation of life in Turkish prisons, through relevant and appropriate United Nations, Council of Europe and other international and regional mechanisms, as well as through country visits and bilateral diplomatic engagement.

Strongly urge the Turkish authorities, to respect and ensure the right to life of persons within their jurisdiction, including when such persons are held in custody.

Urge the Turkish government to organize all State organs and governance structures through which public authority is exercised, including law enforcement agencies, security forces and the military, in a manner consistent with the need to respect and ensure the right to life.

Strongly urge the Turkish government to ensure adequate conditions of detention for all those in deprived of their liberty, including adequate medical care.

Strongly urge the Turkish government to conduct prompt and independent investigations whenever a person dies in custody.
